Dr. Evgenia Lysova successfully defended her PhD thesis

On October 6, 2016, Evgenia Lysova successfully defended her PhD thesis, titled “What does your career mean to you? Understanding individual career and work behaviours through the prism of the meaning of career” and obtained the grade of Doctor at Vrije Universiteit Amsterdam.

The reading committee praised Evgenia for the excellent quality of her dissertation and the valuable scientific contribution to the field of career research.

In her thesis, Evgenia explores how the meanings that individuals ascribe to their careers guide their career and work behaviors through four empirical studies. The findings demonstrate that individuals’ career-related meanings are multidimensional and dependent on the context, and these meanings shed a unique light on individuals’ behaviors in the work context, contributing to the success of individuals and organizations. The results further reveal that those individuals who are self-directed and who are driven by (other-oriented) values in their career development and those who have a calling tend to proactively develop their careers and engage in proactive work behaviors that bring change and innovation in organizations.

Dr. Evgenia Lysova is currently an Assistant Professor of Careers and Organizational Behavior at Vrije Universiteit Amsterdam. She holds a MSc degree in Business Administration from the Vrije Universiteit Amsterdam and a 5-year university degree in Economics and Management (Cum Laude) from St. Petersburg State University of Film and Television. Evgenia’s main research interests are calling, the meaning of work, self-directed career management, and proactive work behaviors.
ABRI congratulates Evgenia on this great achievement.
